Kursusindhold:

If your dog destroys the house the minute you leave, he may be stressed-out. If he has an unpleasant body odor, excessive dandruff or heavy shedding, he may be stressed-out. If he is hyperactive, suddenly aggressive, hides under the bed or displays more than two dozen other symptoms, he may be stressed-out and need your help. The study of stress in human medicine and psychology has taught us that stress can lead to the development of health problems, affect our relationships with others, and can make us unhappy, irritable, and even aggressive. Dogs are no different. The conditions under which dogs are kept today demand a lot of them. They live in a very unnatural world—traffic, noise, crowding, isolation from others of their species, and long separations from their human family.

- There are more than 30 signs of stress in dogs—learn how to spot them.
- Male and female dogs have different stressors, learn what they are and how to avoid them.
- You may be over-doing it—too many outings, too many dog sports, too much stimulation.
- Developing your own “anti-stress” program is logical and simple to implement.
